"THE 'KOHEN' TODAY"

In an important essay published not too long ago, Dr. Samuel Belkin, President of the Yeshiva University, presented a creative insight into the understanding of the commandments of the Torah. There is a great literature on taamei ha-mitzvot, the reasons for the commandments. What Dr. Belkin has proposed is a fundamental distinction between "Reason" for a mitzvah and the "Purpose" of the commandment. The Reason is historical, it is something about which man may speculate and conjecture; but ultimately it is known with certainty only to G-d Himself. Actually, the Reason for legislating a mitzvah does not make too much difference; it is of little consequence to man himself. What is of importance, however, is the Purpose of the mitzvah. Here man must always ask himself: what is it the Torah wants me to accomplish as a result of performing this mitzvah? The Reason for a mitzvah remains the same through all eternity, although it may always remain unknown to man. The Purpose may change from generation to generation, from culture to culture, from society to society. While the Reason is divine, the Purpose is human -- and therefore, while all of us observe the same mitzvot in the same manner, each observance may mean something subtly different for each individual person. Hence, while it may be fruitless to inquire into the Reason for a mitzvah, it is most worthwhile to investigate the Purpose of the mitzvot.

It is in this spirit that we may ask a fundamental question about the teachings of this morning's Sidra. And that is, what is the purpose of the institution of Kehunah, the hereditary Priesthood, for modern Jews living in a free and democratic society? Centuries ago, in the days of the Temple, the Kohahim was a most important functionary in the religious life of the country. It was he who officiated at the sacrificial rites in the Temple. He was supported by an elaborate system of tithes, and so forth. Today, the Kohahim, descendendants of Aaron, the brother of Moses, are distinguished from other Jews by only a few laws, such as: they are honored with the reading of the first portion of the Torah, they may not defile themselves by contact with the dead, they are limited in their choice of a mate by certain marital regulations, and they officiate at the blessing of the congregation on the holidays. Now, in what manner can this residual Kehunah said to be relevant to our lives and times? Once again, we do not ask for the reason, we do not demand that the Torah justify its claim upon us. We shall observe whether our limited intellectual faculties fully understand or not. But what specific purposes, what special nuances of meaningfullness, lie within this biblical legislation?

There are many answers. Those that we shall mention this morning are called especially from the Commentary on the Prayer Book (Clat R'iyyah) by the late Chief Rabbi of the Holy Land, Rabbi Kook, of Blessed Memory.

At the very beginning, we must understand that Kehunah in Jewish life was never meant as a ministry of magic. The Kohanim never waved a wand or performed miracles. Rather, as we discover from a reading of the Bible, the priesthood, with all its hierarchical and hereditary features, was intimately connected with the concept of teaching, especially Torah. Thus, Ezekiel in this morning's Haftorah defines the function of the Kohanim as v'et ami yoru bein kodesh le'chol, "and they shall teach My people to distinguish between the sacred and the profane." Malachi proclaimed siftei kohen yishmeru daat, torah yevakshu mi-pihu, "and the lips of the priest shall keep knowledge, they shall seek Torah from his mouth." In assigning Kehunah to the tribe of Levi, Moses declared, yoru mishpatekha le'yaakov ve'toratkhla le'yisrael, "they shall teach Thy laws to Jacob and Thy Torah to Israel." Kehunah, therefore, is a ministry of horaah, of teaching, of education and edification.
An important aspect of our daily morning service thereby becomes more significant. At the very beginning of the service, one of the first things we recite is the birkhot ha-torah, the blessings over the study of Torah. After we thank G-d for giving us a Torah, we immediately proceed to perform the mitzvah: we study Torah. And what passage of the Bible is it that we choose to recite as part of the study of Torah? - the birkhot kohanim, the blessing that is recited by the priests, "the Lord bless thee and keep thee..."

Why, of all the sublime passages in the Torah, do we choose the Priestly Blessing as the most significant one over which to thank G-d for Torah? Obviously it must be because of the fact that the priests themselves are teachers of Torah or, indirectly, by their very presence in our midst they remind us and challenge us to study the Torah of the Lord.

The great medieval Spanish Rabbi, Abudraham, observed that the Priestly Blessing consists of three verses. The first verse, yevarekhekha ha-Shem ve'yishmerekha, "the Lord bless thee and keep thee," contains three Hebrew words. The second verse contains five words, and the third - seven words. Abudraham remarks that the birkhot kohanim is thus equivalent to the Reading of the Torah, for on weekdays we have three Aliyot, on holidays five Aliyot, and on Saturdays a minimum of seven.

Rav Kook, however, goes beyond a mere arithmetical equivalence and finds deep significance in this relationship of birkhot kohanim to birkhot ha-torah, of priesthood to the teaching of Torah. Kehunah, after all, is not an anachronism. It indicates to us that there are amongst us Jews a family, descended from Aaron, who possess (as Rav Kook calls it) a segulah kelalit ha-baah bi-yerushah, a general talent or predisposition that is bequeathed by heredity. From the very earliest days of the history of our people until 1962, the Kehunah has come down from father to son; a whole family, throughout all these many centuries, has been distinguished by a mandate from the Almighty that its sons be the Ministers of G-d in the midst of Israel, that they be charged with the function of horaah, of teaching the Children of Israel, so that "they shall seek Torah from his mouth." Now the very presence amongst us of this family who are marked by this characteristic, reminds us that all of us Jews, non-Kohanim as well as Kohanim, possess more general and precious segulah kelalit ha-baah bi-yerushah, a heritage of inclination for — the study of Torah.

G-d not only gave us a Torah from above, but implanted within us a readiness to love it and a willingness to obey and follow it. There is in every Jew, by virtue of his being a Jew, this element of spirituality. Every Jew wears the Crown of Torah, even as the descendants of Aaron wear the Crown of Priesthood.

This does not mean that every Jew is born a full-fledged lover of Torah, a mature spiritual personality. By no means. Rather, it means that he has within him the potential for these lofty ends, that if he exerts himself he can attain them, for they are part and parcel of the national cultural heritage of our people.

Here too Rav Kook offers a comment of great insight. When the Kohanim bless the congregation, they accompany their verbal blessing with nesiat kapayim, the raising of their hands with fingers extended. To Rav Kook this is a profound symbol. It is a pointing to the future, an aspiration for transcendence, a reaching out for what is beyond, a stretching of the self to greater heights. Particularly, Rav Kook reminds us that the rights and the privileges of the Kohan to bless his fellow-Israelites derive not from his own actual religious excellence, for not every Kohan who blesses the congregation is necessarily a holy man. Rather, it derives from the charge placed upon him to be holy. Because the Kohan is expected by the Torah to attain a greater measure of sanctity, because he was given the hereditary injunction to reach higher than others, because he was endowed with the predisposition for a great spiritual gestalt, therefore the mitzvah of blessing the congregation devolves upon the Kohen. The prerogative of blessing derives not from the actuality, but from the potentiality of the Kohen; not from his religious character at the present, but from that which he could attain were he to strive for it with sufficient effort and exertion. That is why the Kohen raises his hand in the nesiat kapayim; he is pointing to the future, to the realization of the potential within him. His extended arms are a bridge, which he is bidden to cross, from promise to fulfillment, from small beginnings to great achievements, from what he is to what he can and ought to be.

And this is true of all Jews with regard to Torah. At the foot of Sinai, when we were given the Torah, we were designated a mamlekhet Kohanim -- a kingdom in which all citizens are priests. We are Kohanim of Torah to all of mankind.
Hence, we are different from others not because of what we are, but because of what we can and ought to be. Religious life in Judaism is not a matter only of being holy, but of becoming holier. The hands of the Kohen raised in benediction are for every Jew the symbol of the study of Torah — constant progress, unceasing intellectual ferment, never-ending spiritual development.
The Kohen in our midst teaches us something about our own character and what we ought to do with it. He tells us, as Yehudah Halevi taught in the Kuzari, that Israel is caught up in the inyan Elohi, marked with the indelible traces of the encounter with G-d. He reminds us, as the great founder of the Habad School of Hassidism taught in his Tanya, that every Jew is born with a nefesh ha-Elohit, with a Divine soul, which contains within it an ahavah tiv'it or ahavah mesuteret, a natural love for G-d and Torah which is hidden and unaroused.
Just as a descendant of Aaron is naturally a Kohen, a status from which he cannot resign at will, so is every Jew by nature a homo religiosis, a spiritual creature. Whether he knows it or not — indeed, whether he wants it or not — every Jew has a religious potential within him, the seed of spirituality, the embryo of Kedushah. But from the Kohen he must learn that blessing can come only when, as the extended fingers symbolize, he is willing to actualize his potential, make the seed grow, develop his embryonic talent, express his hidden, natural resources of Torah.

So that the hereditary Kehunah certainly does have a relevant purpose for our lives. It teaches us that Judaism was not superimposed upon Jews. Rather, it is natural and preexistent in the Jewish soul. Torah may have been given from Heaven, but the receptivity for it already existed in the Jewish heart. All that the Jew need do in order to achieve blessing for himself and for all mankind is to arouse and express the spirituality which lies dormant within him.

It is for that reason that we loyal Jews ought to accept with great skepticism and with a sense of humor the predictions of many of our secular and non-observant co-religionists who periodically produce from amongst themselves modern nevi'ei sheker, false prophets, who proclaim the end of classical, traditional Judaism in Jewish life. For us it is unthinkable to imagine Jews without Judaism. Even if Torah should be forgotten for a century, it must return to its former eminence amongst Jews, for there is, in us, as Rav Kook called it, a segulah kelalit ha-baah bi-yerushah, a hereditary predisposition of the spirituality of Torah; or, as the author of Tanya called it, a natural love hidden in the divine soul in every Jew; or, as Halevi termed it, the inyan Elohi. When we see before our eyes a Kohen, a direct descendant of Aaron, the first High Priest, when we behold the physical continuity of ancient Israel and its survival into modern times, then we are seized with a great optimism and hope for survival and ultimate triumph of the spiritual character of Israel into the future.

This is an exhilarating thought, for it encourages us never to despair of any single Jew. Within every Jewish bosom, every Jewish heart, there lies this latent love, this silent passion, this unconscious aspiration. Our sacred duty is — to bring it out into the open, to activate it and actualize it to make this love conscious, so that all Israel will return to G-d, and bring with them all of mankind.

In the words of David, va-esa kapai el mitzvotekha asher ahavti v'asicha be'chukekha. "I shall raise my hands unto Thy commandments which I love, and I shall dwell upon Thy laws." When we shall accept the symbol of the Priestly Blessing, the raising of the hands and the pointing to the future, the transition from potential to real; when we shall take that love for the Mitzvot and actualize it by raising our hands, then we, and all Israel, will dwell upon the laws of G-d and become, once again, a glorious people of Torah.
